Ardent and chivalrous in his temperament, affectionate and kind in disposition, a gallant soldier in the field, a genial comrade in camp, a firm and steadfast friend, a generous enemy, slow to give and quick to resent an insult, ever ready to forgive a wrong and acknowledge a fault, in all the duties and relations of life he bore himself as became a proud, high-spirited gentleman. Sorrowing over the untimely fate of one so young and bright we realize that

His death is to be deplored as a common loss, as well to the community at large as to his friends and relatives. To his family the blow is irreparable. The death of an elder brother who fell in the late war in the service of his country, left him the sole stay and support of a dependent mother and sisters. He assumed the heavy care and responsibility with true manly courage and in the little while he was spared to them proved himself worthy of their trust and confidence. He was the idolized darling of the household, their all in all, and now he is gone to be forever missed from the little circle. The softening touch of time can never heal the wound in their hearts and God alone can give them comfort and consolation in their sore distress.

Afflicted with a painful disease for months he ad known that he was fading away, and yet, in he face of death he bore his sufferings cheerilly and without repining. As the shadow of he grave gathered about him, he rested from his agony and peacefully and quietly the weary soul passed into eternity. His last breath was an interest of the I humble prayer to his Saviour-"Jesus to thee I commit my body and soul."
